Before taking your next selfie to chernobyl, check out the stupidest trends ever on social media. useless to say, please do not try any of these social media trends, as it will not make you cooler (or safer.) in the summer of 2019, 2 million facebook users have climbed on a virtual handwagon to blow up the legendary area 51. the event, which eventually caught the attention of government officials, was removed from facebook after violating the Community guidelines of the site. photo courtesy: christopher Morris/Corbis/Getty images the American army has issued a threatening statement in front of the event.anyone from trying to enter a zone where they train the armed forces. Area 51 has remained an extraterrestrial mystery forand it seems that the mystery must continue. This disturbing trend only requires mobile phone and a lack of privacy concerns. All you have to do is send your "near number" or "near text post" and share your exchange on social media. Your "near number" is someone with a difference of a given from your phone number. courtesy photo: Tammy McGary/Wikimedia Commons Sounds like a good harmless moment, but it's not exactly a smart move. If your "near number" is minor and you are not, you are entering a dadious territory. Besides, not everyone wants to meet their "near text door", so as not to like the answer you get. In 2013, a Tumblr page launched in response to a bizarre trend writer Jason Feifer noticed on vacation. While exploring the Anne Frank Memorial, tourists of all ages were taking selfies in front of the historically significant location. That's how Selfies was born in Serious Places. courtesy photo: @MLDSPOT/Twitter Emphasizing the poor judgment behind these photos, the page of Feifer Tumblr made selfies in concentration camps, funerals and Chernobyl! the new internet cry-worthy fad. These types of photos should not have been so publicly ridiculed, but at least behavior died accordingly. The 2014 #FireChallenge was one of the most dangerous and disastrous trends to invade social media. With the cameras rolling, the participants would like to cover themselves in an inflammable liquid and then they would put themselves ablatt. Firefighters, police officers and social media sites had to publicly denounce the practice to protect the security of the public. Photo Courtesy: @SPFDToypogram/Twitter Unfortunately, this challenge has attracted and caused serious damage. A 12-year-old girl suffered severe burns after trying the challenge with her friends. A teenager describedafter-burn as unbearable. Please, if you're reading this, don't get on fire to see. It's very dangerous and very stupid. This is nice buthow to deceive your pets trend in the summer of 2018. All you needed was a blanket and the attention of your dog or cat to play. Just lift the blanket in front of your pet, let him know that you are right behind it and then fall the blanket while you fall into another room. Complimentary photo: christiand/Twitter It's a quick trick for bait and switching that caught countless animals out of control. Personally speaking, the best videos presented animals that could not matter less than the joke at their expense. The real joke was on the person making the video, which as a viewer, is much more satisfying than a scared kitten. FaceApp became viral in 2017 and initial adapters were immediately hooked on its age altering photoshop skills. In 2019, celebs climbed on board and 80 million users dived in the #FaceAppChallenge. Going viral twice is quite a result for an application, but FaceApp fell prey of a dangerous internet rumors shortly after its second wind. Complimentary photo: @RiaRevealed/Twitter According to a viral tweet, a web developer warned users that the Russian app agreement allowed access to all photos of the phone. Even the photos you didn't use in the app. This gave the app a dangerous reputation, and the reports of the inaccuracy of Tweets were much quieter at the end than the false claim based on fear. This challenge, which in reality runs through until 2001, is a bizarre abuse of a delicious spices. The challenge is simple: film yourself eating a cinnamon spoon in less than a minute without drinking anything to help. After coughing and/or vomiting, charge the unordered online carnage. Complimentary photo: @Da_MF_MOON/Twitter The point of the challenge is to watch people go through a terrible pain in the throat like cinnamoncovers and dries their mouths. Most people end up spitting a cloud of tan powder in pain and hopefully question their life choices later. Don't do this. It has the potential to cause long-term respiratory difficulties, pneumonia or a collapsed lung. InAmerican djbauer has released his debut. Don't even do this. This trend is by far one of the most dangerous internet fads in social media history. Tide released their first packing for individual size laundry pods in 2012, but the media ran wild years later with reports that children exchanged them for candies and could eat them. Complimentary photo: @Barnacles/Twitter Internet found the charge funny, so people turned back filming themselves eating kisses. The clips were quickly disassembled as the Tide Pod Challenge was not a matter of laughing. In less than a year, there were almost 8,000 cases of children poisoning themselves with laundry showers. Don't even make this trend. In 2013, an Instagram comment launched this popular trend, beachside. When Tumblr @andrewpauldavis user saw a couple of legs in a bathtub, he thought they looked like hot dogs. Tumblr loved the view, and a page dedicated exclusively to selfies on the sea of naked legs that might or may not be hot dogs was born. Complimentary photo: @Buzzfeed/Twitter Bronze skin, pink summer in the photos looks very similar to hot dogs, so sometimes it is challenging to differentiate hot dog from legs. It's a strange social media trend, but at least it doesn't put your body in danger. This feline trend took Facebook from storm in early 2012. First, yesa piece of bread and cut a hole 1 inch larger than the head of the cat. Keep your kitten calm while gently putting the bread around your cat's head. Take a picture. Then it becomes a social media legend. average.Cortesia: @HistoryGlimpses/Twitter Some cat owners gave a hit at various degrees of success. Other realized owners there may be repercussions to stop your peaceful feline and avoid trend. We are real, cats can be quite unpredictable. Leave your baby alone and don't waste food! This trend is not only stupid, but it is also super waste. Gallon Smashing requires two liters of milk and total shame. Often held in a supermarket, the Gallon Smasher must first destroy the gallon jugs on the ground and then pretend to slip. Complimentary photo: @KnowYour Meme/Twitter The gold of social media comes twice: you get to see someone fall and someone else turns to look surprised by the person who fell on purpose. I hate to sound like a puzzle, but someone needs to clean up after your stupid joke, and most likely someone else. That's rude. Also, again, do not waste food. It could be the most dangerous type of selfie. The skyscraper selfies require someone to scale the tallest buildings around and commit themselves to extremely dangerous photo shoots. Sometimes referred to as "roofing", this trend really took in Russia and Asia. Complimentary photo: @mongoose115/Twitter Angelina Nikolau made a name for herself on social media thanks to its countless skyscrapers around Europe and Asia. This trend is not for the weak heart, or for anyone who gets ringing hands while watching the selfies of the skyscrapers of other people. You know you saw a flash mob. Since their debut in 2003, it is likely that you have participated in them. It's the viral dance routines in the middle of Times Square. These are the proposals for choreographic marriage in the aisle 3 of the Home Depot. They are all viral video clips on social media, where a large group of people gather to do something totally random and then leave immediatelycourtesy photo: Scott Barbour/Getty Images Maybe the most amazing thing about flash mobs is they're still happening, happening,media trends last about three days, so it is wild to see flash mobs in 2019 out in nature. Since then they have become great instruments for great protests, as bizarre behavior can be exploited to draw attention to worthy causes. Drake has a lot of people to thank for the success of his 2018 success "In My Feelings". Don't get me wrong. It's a certified pop. But it wasn't until the #InMyFeelingsChallenge became viral that his song exceeded the charts. Photo Courtesy: @WPLGLocal10/Twitter Here is how it works: while someone drives (and movies), the passenger jumps out of the car on the move, leaving the door open so he can eat Keke as Drake. There are so many dangerous clips of this viral trend that goes sour that highway signs have gone up encouraging people to stay in their cars. The game is simple: each person takes a turn that shakes a marshmallow in his mouth and says: "Chubby Bunny". This continues until your mouth is so filled that it can no longer hold marshmallows. Or until you can say "Chubby Bunny." Photo Courtesy: CC BY-SA 3.0/Wikimedia Commons This stupid tendency can become untidy, so be careful of any dress you wear. Also, do not rub on marshmallows. Whoever came with this game is still a mystery, but there was a 1959 Peanuts comic book in which Snoopy filled his mouth with marshmallows. I'm just saying. This is another bizarre case of "years do stupid things." Parents and medical professionals were on their hands in 2018, when children on social media were doing the Condom Snorting Challenge. The trend is exactly how it sounds, and yes, it is absolutely stupid to do. courtesy photo: AFP Contributor/Getty Images According to doctors, the biggest risk is that condoms snoring can be a severe stimulant risk. How it looks!t could also stay stuck in the throat and cause the infection. So, please, guys, find a safer way to impress others and cheat death at your next social meeting. Another song, another viral trend on social media. average2016, the rap duo Rae Sremmurd released the music video for "Black Beatles". During the video, people remain completely motionless while the camera moves around them. They all looked like mannequins. Complimentary photo: Husam Abualshaiq/Wikimedia Commons It was enough inspiration for social media, and the #MannequinChallenge was born. People around the world were putting together their own versions of the video with music in the background. Millions of views later, Rae Sremmurd made a song number 1 on the Billboard charts. Do you know where your teenager sleeps? If they are trying to complete the 24-hour challenge for the night, then the answer is likely "No". This is the point of the challenge: teenagers and young adults in 2016 started camping overnight in chain stores and restaurants. Complimentary photo: @dobremarcus/Twitter All you have to do is enter before closing time and hide unnoticed until the next day. This is another trend of social media that parents will not approve, as children are doing it without permission from their parents. A 11-year-old boy from Britain, for example, caused a massive police hunt in 2018, but it turns out he was just camped in an IKEA. In 2015, people need a new way to irritate their cats. Enter Cats against Cetrioli. The premise is quite simple: While your cat is busy eating or licking, put a cucumber just out of its line of vision. When you see a shortcut, hopefully, you have the camera running. courtesy photo: @halepieterxe/Twitter Sometimes cats jump into terror. Sometimes, nothing happens. But should you do that to your pet? Cat Behavioral Experts weighed in, saying that scare animals from their feeding areas can stress them and cause harmful damage and longo how they feel safe. Once again, stop messing with your animals! This social media trend was about extravagance. And he looks hurt. To get the right picture, all you had to do was look like you flattened in your face with your goods scattered around. around.He started in Russia and evolved into a competition to show how incredibly rich you were. Photo Courtesy: @clairesbetty/Twitter In the end, it took the world of storm social media, and the less fortunate put their own twist on the trend. Instead of showing design clothing and jewelry, people show objects that spoke more to their character. Which, compared to the self-help challenges, sounds much more enjoyable. At first, this trend came from a good place. At least that is the beauty blogger and #DonJudgeChallenge creator Em Ford's story. In a 2015 clip from its YouTube channel, the blogger erases his make-up to reveal his true self in an attempt to denounce beauty standards. courtesy photo: @maddystarkel/Twitter Its attempt. "Don't judge a book from its cover" became viral, but social media quickly transformed the trend into trash. Instead of posting photos and videos of power, people instead looked uglier drawing on fake Flemish, acne and freckles. The hashtag was, unfortunately, hijacked by the jokes. This is a classic case of web hysteria and parents do not speak enough with their children. According to the news of 2019, the Momo Challenge was a social media game where images of a demonic chicken woman slide into your child's DM with the commands of committing violence against others. courtesy photo: @elementarty/Twitter Social media representatives and web experts said there was no proof that a child was pushed to violence by Momo Lady. A bit of dripping internet later, the first image of Momo Lady was found. It wasn't a demonic chicken coming after your children. It was an art sculpture in 2016 by a Japanese artist. This trend in 2016 had the potential to be really dangerous. A person tries to runtwo files of people who all throw their backpacks to break down the runner. These chaotic clips were all anger for high school girls, but this challenge could seriously haveSomeone. courtesy photo: @alli_jones34/Twitter Remember how heavy your textbooks were in high school? They were huge! It's really a surprise we didn't get the scoliosis. Now imagine thirty backpacks full of heavy textbooks that are launched in your direction. Not the most pleasant (or smart) viral trend. This paranormal trend dates back to many years. In Spain, more generations of young people played Juego de la Lapicera (the game of pencils). In 2015, he made his crossover to the states, renamed the #CharlieCharlie challenge. You just need two pencils and a piece of paper. courtesy photo: Yunshui/Wikimedia First, you label four sections of the card yes or no. Next, it balances two perpendicular pencils above each other, creating a grid. So, ask Charlie, the supernatural entity, a question. The supernatural forces (or the wind) will point to the right answer. It's as magical as a Magic 8-Ball. This trend is also one of the most dangerous in this list. Dating back to the 1980s, automotive surfing is when someone jumps on top of a moving car and pretends to ride it as a surfboard. Trust us when we say "Don't do this"! Complimentary photo: @jess3rdcoast/Twitter According to the reports of the Centers for Disease Control, 58 deaths were associated with road navigation between 1990 and August 2008. Adrenaline drug addicts and teens attention, stay in the seat of your car and stop trying to surf cars. This food challenge is disgusting to the core. The challengers are committed to quickly eat two bananas and follow them with a liter of Sprite. That's where things get disgusting. Win the challenge if you don't throw up later. Photo Cortesia: Granger/Wikimedia Commons The challenge implies that the body cannot digest bananas and beverages at the same time. It is also possible that your body ate too fast, withI throw up. this challenge, like any other food challenge, is not a dish thatHow to eat. eat.
