IIICWhen they broke out in 2012, the Haim sisters sold a tempting sound of intertwined beats, harmonies and classic rock quotes and seemed to explore all the possible permutations of that sound on two albums. It's hard to say exactly what changed for their third release, but Women in Music Pt. III emanates a feeling of and game that equals a breakthrough. With complicated loops, linguish instruments and petty samples, each measurement of the music is worthy of obsession. To have success at the borders of Tiktok take a certain type of great Bratty, and the 20-year Alabama rapper Flo Milli is the best ambassador of that attitude. The music of it mixes the gloss and dissonance multiple times: in the sarcasm of its geeshucks inflections; In the Vibra de Playskool-Kegger of the rhythms of him; the exquisite exasperation of its ad-libs; and in its always so fierce fierce to exchange clichés ("Your baby mother is my groupie!"). Even as your mixed debut hits a consistent and addictive sound, Flo Milli varies its technique with altered, hypnotic and bruising flows. Another timely virtue: If you ever feel bad about ignoring someone's text messages, put on a Flo Milli song. Somewhere there, it will hold such rudeness as a movement of power. — S. K.
