I keep waiting for that moment when the image of which school will seem like this fall goes from hell to something at least a sort of visible. The school itself comes with a huge risk of community health. Total learning is difficult for some students and impossible for others. And some combination of the two is a logistical nightmare for the working parents. Is it like choosing an apple bruised by a basket of bruised apples, which is more rotten inside? Few big cities – New York, Los Angeles, San Diego – have announced back-to-school plans that are partially in-person or entirely online. Meanwhile, the Orange County Education Council recommends the exact opposite—a full-time return, self-learning without masks or other social space requirements. And many of us are still holding our breath, uncertain where our districts will land on the spectrum of “ugh” to “yikes”. This is out of control. Our favorite personal strategies cannot even be feasible. You might want to go to school, but you still have to work. You may want to pay someone else at home school, but they don't have the room in the budget to do it. You may want to full-time school and now find yourself scrambling once again to figure out how to manage their training at home. As difficult as spring, with our children at home with us all day, as we ourselves tried to... But there's a little thing you can do. A small needle of control between the hay that is this pandemic. You can comb through this report, written by researchers and professors of the Harvard School of Public Health program. And then you can compare with the plan of your school district (every time you get) and see where are the discrepancies. Because once you know where discrepancies are, you can take safer measures with your mother-teacher organization, school administration, superintendent or school council. The report describes the recommendations for five aspects of the school in person: Health Classrooms Healthy Buildings Healthy Plans Healthy Activities The authors give summaries, risk reduction strategies and background for each of the five categories. There is a lot in this report – it is 62 pages long – but it is organized in a way that makes it easy to skim if you are looking for specific recommendations around, say, use of the mask, as well as more detailed background on the challenges we are facing. Of course, the usual warning applies: There are a lot of suggested strategies here, not all of which will be feasible in each school or any class environment. But noting how many or how many of these strategies your district is implementing can help determine if they are doing- or at least as much as possible – to progressively reduce the risk if they decide to go ahead with in-person education. Production 4 PM / Shutterstock.com There is so much to think about when choosing a house to buy: location, floor, property taxes, if you will have any neighboring nosy around. If you have children, choosing a house in a reputable school district could also be at the top of the list. It is for 53% of buyers with children, according to a 2019 report of the National Association of Realtors. See: Explore the cost of education in the United StatesFind Out: Can you Afford Education in America at these prices? But you may not realize that if you are either a parent, school districts can play an important role in your homebuying decision. That's what you should know about how school districts influence your finances when they buy a house. Quality school district = higher costs “How both a real estate agent and a real estate investor, I can tell you first person that the quality of a school district affects the delivery costs,” said Amanda Moore, a real estate agent of Perfect Valley Homes. He explained that in a good school district, electoral board measures relating to education are often approved unanimously, resulting in increased ownership taxes. “In addition, the actual price of houses located within the preferred neighborhoods is high, simply because of the demand,” he added. In fact, Realtor.com's analysis found that houses in higher public schools are, on average, 49% more expensive than the national median and 77% more expensive than those in lower rank districts. Experts weigh But there are also many disadvantages. One big: you get less home for your money. You have to settle for a less expensive house — and maybe give up a couple of your must-have — or take a bigger loan. This could also mean paying a slightly higher interest rate due to increased risk, which results in tens of thousands of dollars on a mortgage15 or 30 years. Also consider that homes in the district keep their value as long as the scores remain high. Gradet noted that school scores can change, and with them, so can home values. In addition, top schools are often invested in maintaining their rankings, rankings, can not always translate to the best education for your particular child if your child does not fit into a typical academic mold,” Gradet said. Discover: How Coronavirus revealed America is failing children — and parents should consider a district in low-corroting? Sure, you want the best for your kids. However, high evaluations do not always translate into better education. “The problem is that people who are hunting home based on schools are often only looking at the scores they are seeing on any real estate search site they are using, but these scores do not tell a full story about the quality of the school,” Gradet said. Often, you end up paying significantly more money to be areas for a specific school, but in reality, what makes the higher school score might not be something that actually benefits your child. “I recommend all my clients to take a deeper dip on schools that can be lower score – especially if there is a house they love – because they can be pleasantly surprised,” said Gradet. “To use a poker metaphor: look at the whole hand, not just a card. A school can be better than B school — but is it $200,000+ better?” Click To see: The cost of College the year you were bornRead: Here's how economists say a good public school teacher is worse Considering some of the advantages of buying in a non-so-great school neighborhood: Not only do you get more home for your money, Gradet noticed there can also be less competition for homes if you live in a hot market like Los Angeles. Provides the ability to help build a community school and add value to the neighborhood. “Party involvement can do a lot to improve a school,” Gradet said. These school areas also typically offer the potential for a more diverse experience for your children, according to Gradet. In addition, the possibility of sub-inscription means that the student body is smaller and the child can end with a smaller class size (aka more individual attention). Ultimately, homebuyers who are interested in school districts should worry less than large metrics and focus on finding the best general solution for their family. “Schools are just a factor – like pools or views – that affect the value of a house,” Gradet said. “They should be considered, but they are not the end of everything, be all that makes a house right for you.” More by GOBankingRates Last Update: 13 August 2021 From Health magazine5. Mountain Valley MiddleMexico, Maine320 students in degrees 6-8 Morning at Mountain Valley Middle: Children and teachers eat nutritious breakfasts in their classrooms. Through this innovative approach,Last year, students start their days more carefully and learn conversation skills and table modes from their role models. This was the only creative idea that our judges complained about in this far north rural school. Mountain Valley takes full advantage of the external ethos, making children move in activities such as mountain biking, canoeing, canoeing, and also walks with moonlight snowshoes. A special award goes to Mountain Valley for dealing with a growing suicide problem among teenagers. “So health education often focuses exclusively on physical health,” says Judge Martin. «With all the influences to which students are exposed, ensuring good mental health should be a priority for all schools». Zodiacphoto/ShutterstockAs a parent, it is natural to want your child to attend a school that favors a positive learning environment to help them build a successful future. And while the type of school you choose will not necessarily build or destroy the future of your child, for some parents the search for the right school is an amazing experience. Fortunately, the real estate site homes.com has created an interactive map of easy use of the best public and private schools, as well as the best school districts of every state, to facilitate the process for you. According to the website's data analysis, the Jericho Union Free School District of Jericho, New York, has earned the honor of being named the best school district of America, for the school year 2018/2019. But here's a twist: the best schools in the country were not actually within the free school district of Jericho Union. The Illinois Mathematics and Science Academy of Aurora, Illinois, is the most important public school in America. The Phillips Academy in Andover, Massachusetts, is classified as the best private school in the country. The school charts come from niche.com, a site that aggregates data to classify colleges, schools and U.S. neighborhoods. The scores of school districts were calculated according to the academic ranking, teachers' vote, food, diversity and health care, among other variables. Since homes.com has examined only high schools in each state, none of the schools or districts have had a general place less than an A-. In fact, the free school district of the Union of Jericho received an A+ degree in most key metrics such as academics, teachers and more. In addition to being in the first place in the country, the district ranked at the top of the ranking as the safest and best school district in the state of New York. And it can be said that students appreciate the quality education they are receiving. “I had teachers who remain after working hours, after the day is already over, just to help me with my homework or help me understand something.” Jack Mok, a student who just graduated from Jericho High School, told ABC 7. In addition, students are incredibly intelligent; at least 89% of the nearly 3,000 students in the K-12 classes are skilled in mathematics and 84% are proficient in reading, according to tests analyzed by niche.com. Don't miss these 11 secret habits of first-level students that everyone should steal. A very high price. Most homes in the area sell from $800,000 to over a million dollars. Ultimately, it's up to you and your family to choose the perfect school that suits everyone's needs. No matter where you live or what school you send your children to, make sure you memorize these secrets that only the parents of the students know. Originally Published: 10 September 2018
